Protik's FRP trays are designed for low-voltage, telecommunication, and fiber-optic cables, with solid or perforated bottoms to protect cables in corrosive environments. They undergo rigorous quality testing to ensure performance in structurally demanding conditions.

Considerations for Selection

Material and Durability: FRP/GRP trays resist corrosion and electrical conductivity issues compared to steel trays. Load Capacity: Suitable for light to medium cable loads, depending on design and resin type. Customization: Many manufacturers provide bends, tees, reducers, and other fittings to meet project-specific requirements.

Compliance: Ensure products meet international standards and local project specifications. These manufacturers provide reliable solutions for industrial facilities, construction projects, and chemical or power plants in Iraq, offering both standard and customized fiberglass cable tray systems.
