Key Takeaways

The 6-core butterfly-shaped drop-in optical cable is a compact, high-performance FTTH cable designed for indoor and last-mile fiber deployments, featuring low-bend-sensitivity fibers, FRP strength members, and LSZH sheath for safety and flexibility.

Cable Structure and Design

The cable has a butterfly-shaped flat profile, with the optical fibers positioned at the center and reinforced by two parallel Fiber Reinforced Plastic (FRP) strength members on either side, providing tensile strength and crush resistance while maintaining flexibility. The outer sheath is typically LSZH (Low Smoke Zero Halogen), ensuring fire safety and minimal toxic emissions during indoor installation. The 6-core configuration allows for multiple fiber connections in a compact form factor, suitable for residential or commercial FTTH networks.

Fiber and Performance

The optical fibers are usually G. 657A2 single-mode fibers, optimized for tight bending radii (as low as 20mm), reducing signal loss in compact installations. This low-bend-sensitivity fiber ensures high bandwidth and excellent communication transmission, making it ideal for high-speed internet, IPTV, and data services.

The non-metallic FRP members also provide lightning protection and anti-electromagnetic interference, enhancing reliability in indoor and outdoor environments.

Installation and Practical Advantages

The butterfly-shaped design simplifies routing along walls, corners, and conduits, preventing rolling or twisting during deployment. Its small diameter, lightweight, and flexible structure make it easy to handle, strip, splice, and maintain. Compared to traditional round cables, this design reduces bending stress, installation time, and labor costs, while occupying minimal space in ducts or conduits.
