Key Takeaways

A 116 beam splitter typically costs between $50 and $500, depending on type, material, and coating. The price of a beam splitter varies widely based on its type, material, and optical specifications. Standard cube or plate beam splitters for visible light applications generally range from $50 to $200 for basic models, while high-precision, non-polarizing, or dielectric-coated splitters can cost $300 to $500 or more.

Specialty beam splitters, such as pellicle or dichroic types, may exceed this range due to their delicate construction and wavelength-specific coatings. Factors affecting cost include: Type of splitter: Cube, plate, pellicle, or prism. Cubes are often more durable and easier to mount, while pellicles minimize ghosting but are more fragile.

Splitting ratio: Common ratios are 50: 50, 70: 30, or 80: 20. Precision ratios with tight tolerances increase cost. Coating and wavelength range: Dielectric coatings for lasers or broadband applications are more expensive than simple metallic coatings.

Polarization properties: Non-polarizing or polarizing splitters require more precise manufacturing, raising the price. Size and power handling: Larger optics or those designed for high-power lasers cost more due to material and fabrication requirements. For purchasing, suppliers like Thorlabs, Edmund Optics, and RP Photonics offer a wide range of beam splitters with prices listed on their websites, allowing you to select based on your specific optical requirements.
